This guide sets out the key protections provided to whistleblowers under the law, together with some practical tips for managing whistleblowing at work, including where Employment Tribunal litigation ensues. It takes account of the new changes to the law on whistleblowing which came into effect on 25 June 2013 under the Enterprise and Regulatory Reform Act 2013 ('ERRA'). Whistleblowing is also a hot topic at present due to the Government’s consultation on the framework of whistleblowing laws.

Approximately 1,800 whistleblowing claims are made each year and the figure is rising annually. Moreover, since compensation is uncapped, it can be high. The average compensation payment to successful claimants after trial is £113,667, with the highest payment being £3.8m, according to 2010 Public Concern At Work. Understanding how to manage whistleblowing and Employment Tribunal whistleblowing claims is therefore increasingly important for employers.

1 Purpose of whistleblowing legislation

Whistleblowing legislation was originally introduced in 1998 following the realisation that a number of disasters could have been prevented or their effect reduced if a worker had spoken up and/or their employer had listened to them (e.g. Clapham rail crash 1988, BCCI collapse 1992 in which staff were afraid to speak up). The Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998 ('PIDA') was brought into force on 2 July 1999, inserting new sections into the Employment Rights Act 1996.

Encouraging whistleblowers to come forward can also be in the interests of employers since whistleblowers can assist in uncovering wrongdoing within the organisation. This can help prevent accidents, financial scandals, criminal offences and regulatory breaches. It can also assist in allowing organisations to deal with issues internally, managing what information is disclosed outside the organisation.

2 Whistleblower protections

The law provides two key protections to workers who blow the whistle.

2.1 Automatically unfair dismissal

First, dismissing an employee who has blown the whistle is automatically unfair if the reason or principal reason for the dismissal is that they have made a protected disclosure. Employees bringing such claims do not need the normal two years’ service to bring an unfair dismissal claim linked to whistleblowing. Moreover, the cap on unfair dismissal compensation is lifted in whistleblowing claims, meaning that compensation can be high, especially if the individual encounters difficulties in finding a new job because of the dismissal.

2.2 Unlawful detriment

Secondly, subjecting a worker to a detriment on the ground that he has made a protected disclosure is unlawful. Determints include but are not limited to pay cuts, limiting career prospects and disciplinary action. They include detriments occurring after the termination of employment (Woodward v Abbey National Plc (2006)), so employers should proceed cautiously in relation to e.g. references.

3 Who is protected?

Employees are protected in relation to dismissal. Both employees and workers (including some LLP members) are protected in respect of detriment claims. There is no qualifying length of service for bringing whistleblowing claims.

4 Qualifying disclosures

4.1 Categories

Six categories of disclosure are qualifying disclosures. The information disclosed must, in the worker’s reasonable belief, tend to show that one of the following has occurred or is likely to occur:

(i) a criminal offence
(ii) breach of a legal obligation
(iii) a miscarriage of justice
(iv) danger to the health and safety of any individual
(v) damage to the environment
(vi) the deliberate concealment of information regarding any of the above categories

4.2 Reasonable belief

So long as the worker subjectively believes, acting reasonably, that the relevant failure has occurred or is likely to occur, they will be protected, even if their belief turns out to be wrong (Babula v Waltham Forest College (2007)). However, ‘reasonable belief’ is more than unsubstantiated rumour or opinion.

4.3 Information

The disclosure must be of information, rather than an allegation or statement of opinion. The worker making the disclosure must convey facts, although he will be protected even if those facts are already known by the recipient. Disclosures can be in writing (e.g. grievance/solicitor’s letter), oral (e.g. during appraisal/discussion), or via media e.g. video. Disclosures can relate to an entity other than the employer (e.g. a client).
5 Protected disclosures – to whom can the disclosure be made?

To be a protected disclosure, the whistleblower must make a qualifying disclosure to an appropriate person or organisation.

5.1 Encouraging disclosures internally

In most cases, disclosures should be made to the employer. Employers can encourage this by having a written whistleblowing policy setting out how to do this. Some employers have anonymous whistleblowing hotlines which enable employees to disclose information without providing their names.

5.2 External disclosures

However, in some circumstances, workers are protected if they disclose information externally. Notably:

5.2.1 Prescribed persons

Parliament has approved a list of “prescribed persons” to whom workers can make disclosures, provided the worker believes the information is substantially true and concerns a matter within that person’s area of responsibility. They include (but are not limited to) HMRC, the Health and Safety Executive and the Office of Fair Trading. There is no requirement for the employee to alert the employer.

5.2.2 Third parties

Where the worker reasonably believes a third party (such as a client or supplier) is responsible for the wrongdoing, they can report it to that third party without telling the employer.

5.2.3 Other external sources (e.g. media)

Disclosure to other external sources (e.g. the media) is protected only if the worker believes the information is substantially true and does not act for gain. So workers who receive payment for a story to a newspaper are not protected. Unless the matter is “exceptionally serious”, they must have already disclosed it to the employer or a prescribed person, or believe that, if they do, evidence would be destroyed or they would suffer reprisals. Disclosure to that person must also be reasonable.

An example is Goode v Marks and Spencer plc (2010) – the employee’s disclosure was not protected because it had not been disclosed in substantially the same form to the employer before employee went to The Times newspaper. However, exceptionally serious information can be disclosed externally first – an example is Collins v The National Trust (2006) where the worker was protected when he disclosed information related to asbestos concerns.

Commercial organisations should not rely on confidential information clauses in employment contracts to prevent the worker from making a disclosure externally. These are unenforceable if the worker makes a protected disclosure and seeking to enforce them could amount to an unlawful detriment against the worker.

5.3 Disclosures by the Tribunal to regulators

Since 6 April 2010, Claimants can tick a box in their ET1 Claim Form (section 10) to refer claim to relevant regulator for investigation. The Employment Tribunal will pass on a copy of the ET1 (or parts of it) to the relevant regulator and will then inform both the claimant and the respondent to whom the form has been sent.

6 Must the disclosure be made for the right reason?

Originally, PIDA set out a requirement that the disclosure had to be made in good faith for the worker to be protected. However, although PIDA’s long title was An Act to protect individuals who make certain disclosures of information in the public interest, there was no requirement within the legislation for the disclosure to be in the public interest.

On 25 June 2013, two key changes occurred in relation to the whistleblower’s reason and motivation in making a disclosure:

6.1 Removal of ‘good faith’ requirement

First, whistleblower protection was expanded to those who make disclosures in bad faith (e.g. because their disclosures are motivated primarily by money or spite, rather than a desire to put right a wrong). However, if an Employment Tribunal upholds an employer’s argument that a disclosure was made in bad faith, it has power to reduce compensation by up to 25%.

Case law suggests that disclosures predominantly for personal interest or with malice are not in good faith – Bachnak v Emerging Markets Partnership Europe (2006).

Note that a qualifying disclosure made to an employer before 25 June 2013 will be protected only if it was made in good faith. The good faith requirement has been removed only for disclosures made on or after that date.

6.2 Introduction of ‘public interest’ requirement

Secondly, there is now a requirement that the disclosure must be in the reasonable belief of the worker be made in the ‘public interest’.

Prior to 25 June 2013, it was possible for an employee to bring a whistleblowing claim on the basis that his disclosure was made in good faith (e.g. because their disclosures were motivated primarily by money or spite, rather than a desire to put right a wrong). However, if an Employment Tribunal upholds an employer’s argument that a disclosure was made in bad faith, it has power to reduce compensation by up to 25%.

Case law suggests that disclosures predominantly for personal interest or with malice are not in good faith – Bachnak v Emerging Markets Partnership Europe (2006).

Note that a qualifying disclosure made to an employer before 25 June 2013 will be protected only if it was made in good faith. The good faith requirement has been removed only for disclosures made on or after that date.

The new public interest requirement does not apply to disclosures made before 25 June 2013. Employers should therefore be mindful that if a worker is subjected to a detriment or dismissed on or after 25 June 2013 in respect of a disclosure made prior to that date, the worker will be protected even if the disclosure was not in the public interest.

“...there was no requirement within the legislation for the disclosure to be in the public interest. On 25 June 2013, two key changes occurred in relation to the whistleblower’s reason and motivation in making a disclosure: First, whistleblower protection was expanded to those who make disclosures in bad faith (e.g. because their disclosures are motivated primarily by money or spite, rather than a desire to put right a wrong). However, if an Employment Tribunal upholds an employer’s argument that a disclosure was made in bad faith, it has power to reduce compensation by up to 25%. Case law suggests that disclosures predominantly for personal interest or with malice are not in good faith – Bachnak v Emerging Markets Partnership Europe (2006). Note that a qualifying disclosure made to an employer before 25 June 2013 will be protected only if it was made in good faith. The good faith requirement has been removed only for disclosures made on or after that date. Secondly, there is now a requirement that the disclosure must be in the reasonable belief of the worker be made in the ‘public interest’. Prior to 25 June 2013, it was possible for an employee to bring a whistleblowing claim on the basis that his disclosure was made in good faith (e.g. because their disclosures were motivated primarily by money or spite, rather than a desire to put right a wrong). However, if an Employment Tribunal upholds an employer’s argument that a disclosure was made in bad faith, it has power to reduce compensation by up to 25%. Case law suggests that disclosures predominantly for personal interest or with malice are not in good faith – Bachnak v Emerging Markets Partnership Europe (2006). Note that a qualifying disclosure made to an employer before 25 June 2013 will be protected only if it was made in good faith. The good faith requirement has been removed only for disclosures made on or after that date. The new public interest requirement does not apply to disclosures made before 25 June 2013. Employers should therefore be mindful that if a worker is subjected to a detriment or dismissed on or after 25 June 2013 in respect of a disclosure made prior to that date, the worker will be protected even if the disclosure was not in the public interest.

Nicola Rabson, Linklaters Employment Partner, speaking on Radio 4’s Today programme on 25 June 2013
Causation and taking action against a whistleblower for a separate reason

7.1 Causation
Causation is often a key issue in whistleblowing claims. Many whistleblowing claims fail because the worker is unable to establish a causal link between their detriment/dismissal and their whistleblowing. Because causation is often a key issue in whistleblowing claims, witness evidence is often critical – whether the Employment Tribunal believes a manager’s evidence as to why a worker was treated in a certain way can be determinative.

7.2 Taking action for a separate reason
Employers who wish to take action for a separate reason should proceed cautiously where a worker has made a protected disclosure, and create a clear paper trail to evidence its reasoning.

If an employee goes further than making a disclosure and conducts gross misconduct in doing so in order to prove their point, their conduct is unlikely to be protected by PIDA. For example, in Bolton School v Evans (2006), the worker’s conduct was not protected when he sought to prove his disclosure that the company’s IT system was not secure by hacking into the system. However, employers should proceed cautiously, since an Employment Tribunal may not accept an employer’s assertion that a dismissal was separate from a protected disclosure.

8 Vicarious liability
On 25 June 2013, ERRA introduced the concept of vicarious liability into whistleblowing law. It imposes vicarious liability on an employer for detriments, on grounds that a worker made a protected disclosure, by other workers on that first worker. This reverses a loophole in the original drafting of the whistleblowing legislation, and brings vicarious liability for whistleblowing into line with the position regarding discrimination under the Equality Act 2010.

The employer will have a defence if it took all reasonable steps to prevent the detrimental treatment. Having an appropriate whistleblowing policy and providing training to support this will therefore be very important.

9 Remedies
9.1 Interim relief
Interim relief is available for employees who are ‘likely’ to succeed in unfair dismissal cases linked to whistleblowing. Employment Tribunals can make an order for the continuation of employment pending the final determination of the case. Interim relief is rarely granted, possibly because applications must be made within seven days of the termination date. However, it is important for employers to be mindful of the risk since it can be expensive, particularly if a claim proceeds to an appeal.

Employment Tribunals hold interim relief hearings very quickly and are required to give employers only seven days notice of a hearing. Such hearings are rarely postponed, so quick preparation is critical.

9.2 Compensation
Compensation for whistleblowing is uncapped. It is primarily based on loss and is what is ‘just and equitable’ in the circumstances. Since whistleblowing cases can be reputationally damaging for employees in addition to employers, there is a risk that a Tribunal will make an award for career-long loss. For example, in Lingard v HM Prison Service (2005), the claimant was awarded £477,600, including £228,000 future loss of earnings for ‘career long loss’. And in Watkinson v. Royal Cornwall NHS Trust (2011), the claimant was awarded £1.2m including £569,158 future loss of earnings to retirement, and £348,382 for pension loss.

If a whistleblowing claim is a risk in a dismissal situation, employers should follow the ACAS Code, otherwise uncapped compensation could be increased by up to 25%.

9.3 Injury to feelings
Injury to feelings awards can be awarded in detriment cases (but not in dismissal cases). Injury to feelings compensation is assessed according to the guidelines in Vento v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire Police (2003) (which have been revised upwards to reflect inflation). The current Vento guidelines (as adjusted in 2010) set out three compensation bands according to the severity of the case: (i) £600 – £6,000, (ii) £6,000 – £18,000, (iii) £18,000 – £30,000.

9.4 Other remedies
The tribunal can make reinstatement or re-engagement orders, in the same way as for other unfair dismissal claims. Such orders are rare. Likewise, aggravated/exemplary damages can be awarded but are rare (usually in the range of £5,000 – £7,000).

10 Other sources of guidance/requirements
Aside from employment law, other sources of guidance/requirements in relation to whistleblowing are as follows.

10.1 Bribery Act 2010
The Bribery Act 2010, which came into force on 1 July 2011, introduced a new offence where a commercial organisation fails to prevent bribery by its employees (section 7). The organisation has a defence if it can show that they had in place adequate procedures designed to prevent bribery. Guidance from the Ministry of Justice dated 30 March 2011 indicates that this includes having effective whistleblowing procedures that encourage reporting of bribery.

10.2 FCA Whistleblowing guidance
The FCA’s website sets out guidance on whistleblowing in the financial services industry.

10.3 Listed Companies
For listed companies, it is part of the obligations under the UK Corporate Governance Code to maintain a sound system of internal control. Whistleblowing arrangements form part of the system of internal control. Further guidance on whistleblowing for listed companies is contained in the Turnbull Guidance (paragraph 21) and by the ICAEW.

11 Settlement
Approximately 70% of whistleblowing claims are settled or withdrawn before trial. Since whistleblowing claims are often expensive and time consuming to pursue/defend and there can be reputational consequences for both the claimant and employer, it can often be in both parties’ interests to seek a settlement prior to trial.

12 The future
12.1 Government consultation
On 15 July 2013, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment Relations and Consumer Affairs issued a written ministerial statement announcing a call for evidence on the framework of whistleblowing laws. The Government’s consultation on whistleblowing closes on 1 November 2013. It seeks views on whether:
- the categories of disclosure which qualify for protection are still effective in capturing all instances of wrongdoing
- the methods by which the disclosure is made are still relevant and effective
- the list of prescribed individuals/bodies, that is, to whom the disclosure can be made, captures the individuals and bodies sufficiently to ensure that the whistleblower benefits from the protection
- the coverage of the definition of worker is sufficiently broad to capture all those that need to be protected by the framework
12.2 Whistleblower protection

Several areas of employment law have been reformed recently or are in the process of being reformed. However, whistleblowing is often an area which is excluded when the burden of employment laws on companies is reduced. Notably:
> the cap on unfair dismissal does not apply when the dismissal is linked to whistleblowing
> the confidential status afforded to pre-termination negotiations regarding settlement, which came into force on 29 July 2013, does not apply when the individual has a whistleblowing claim > the proposed new category of employee, ‘employee shareholder’, which is due to come into force by 1 September 2013, excludes certain employment rights in return for a capital gains tax advantage, however the ability to bring a whistleblowing claim is not excluded

13 Practical tips for employers to manage whistleblowing at work

13.1 Policy, training and culture

> Implement a whistleblowing policy setting out clearly that disclosures should be made internally and providing details of how this should be done.
> To limit the risk of vicarious liability, publicise the whistleblowing policy and provide whistleblowing training to employees, especially those at managerial level.
> Consider appointing a dedicated whistleblowing officer – this should be someone regarded as approachable by employees.
> Good risk management should include supervision, team working and fostering an open working culture. Actively encourage early reporting of concerns.
> Larger organisations could consider implementing an anonymous whistleblowing hotline. This encourages disclosure of potentially important information but makes it less likely that a claim will result since it is less likely they can be dismissed or subject to a detriment if their identity is concealed. However, note that this may make disclosures more difficult to investigate thoroughly.

13.2 Employment contracts

> Include clauses in employment contracts requiring employees to disclose the wrongdoing of others within the organisation.
> Do not rely on confidential information clauses in employment contracts to prevent the worker from making a disclosure externally. These are unenforceable if the worker makes a protected disclosure and seeking to enforce them could amount to an unlawful detriment against the worker.

13.3 Investigations

> Investigate thoroughly the concerns and, where possible, keep the whistleblower informed about the progress of the investigation.
> Consider if any new practices can be put in place to deal with the concerns raised by the whistleblower.
> Note that the worker will be protected even if he discloses facts which are already known to the recipient of the information, or if the worker’s belief subsequently turns out to be wrong following an investigation, but he reasonably believed it to be correct when making the disclosure.

13.4 Taking action

> Before taking any action against a worker, identify whether there is a risk of a whistleblowing claim, as this may raise the risk significantly. Beware of potential whistleblowing claims in the context of other employment disputes. Seek legal advice if you are in any doubt as to whether whistleblowing may be an issue.
> If a whistleblower is to be dismissed for another reason (e.g. gross misconduct) proceed cautiously and create a clear paper trail evidencing the reason for dismissal. Be mindful of the risk that an Employment Tribunal may find that the real or principal reason for dismissal was the protected disclosure.
> If a whistleblowing claim is a risk in a dismissal situation, follow the ACAS Code, otherwise uncapped compensation could be increased by up to 25%.
> Note that an employer can be found to have subjected a worker to an unlawful detriment even after employment has terminated so be mindful of e.g. unfavourable references.

13.5 Employment Tribunal whistleblowing claims

> If interim relief is sought, employers should prepare quickly since Employment Tribunals will list hearings promptly.
> Because causation is often a key issue in whistleblowing claims, witness evidence is often critical. Note that preparation time for a Tribunal Hearing will be significant for those involved. All witnesses will need to attend at least part of the Tribunal Hearing. Check early on that your witnesses can attend the listed Hearing dates and block the dates out of their diaries.
> Consider seeking to settle a whistleblowing claim by confidential ACAS conciliation or mediation where sensitive or confidential information is involved since Employment Tribunal claims are generally held in public.

13.6 Other practical issues

> Consider whether the employer has any obligation to inform the police or any regulatory body of the information disclosed.
> Bear in mind the requirements of the Bribery Act 2010, the FSA guidance and the Corporate Governance Code, where applicable to your organisation.

Key contacts

Nicola Rabson
Partner, London
Tel: +44 20 7456 5284
nicola.rabson@linklaters.com

Jean Lovett
Partner, London
Tel: +44 20 7456 3698
jean.lovet@linklaters.com

Emma Williamson
Managing Associate, London
Tel: +44 20 7456 4425
emma.williamson@linklaters.com

For further information, please get in touch with your usual contact in the Employment and Incentives Team at Linklaters.